Objectives

Challenge students by providing a difficult scenario that causes them to question the importance of their own self-image or the importance of respect of the group

Risk Level: Beginner

Cautions: None

Instructions

1. Activity can either be administered to the individual or as a group effort
2. If utilizing it as a group activity split students into smaller groups (3-4 students)
3. Provide the students with the prompt on the next page and then leave 5-10 for them to process how they would handle the situation
4. Have them share with the group how they would handle the case study
5. Follow the discussion with the provided debrief questions to further the conversation.

Prompt:
Danita, a sophomore, is the new president of your organization. She was elected president because she is organized, enthusiastic, and extremely committed to the organization’s success. She ran unopposed, but the membership in general seems happy with its new leader. As the semester progresses and Danita becomes familiar with her role, she becomes more and more effective. She motivates the group, holds members accountable, and gives lots of praise.

A junior member of the organization, Wanda, volunteers to hang posters for an upcoming event. However, she doesn’t get the posters hung until the night before the event. As a result, very few people are aware of the event and attendance is low. Danita confronts Wanda about her lateness in hanging the posters and Wanda gets very upset and offensive. She tells Danita that she is an ineffective leader and that since she’s only a sophomore she shouldn’t be telling her what to do. Wanda reminds Danita that she’s been in the organization longer than Danita has and that she knows what is best for the group.
